MAIN PLOTPOINTS

- Normal notes about plant gathering and resources, excited about new research trip
- Comments on how the plants are “thriving” and growing really well in the ship
- Plants are getting out of hand, growing out of their rooms - People have to regularly cut vines. Plants grow back faster and tougher than before, almost like they are evolving and adapting faster every time they get stopped

NOTE 1

Landed on the target planet. It’s beautiful, leagues more vibrant and interesting than anything back on Earth. No signs of hostile lifeforms, although the flora here seems to be thriving. The team seems to be in high spirits, eager to get to work. That's what 5 years of nothing but sailing through space will do to you I suppose.

Comment and Suggestions - Hans 04/10

Note sounds quite natural in tone and would be great as either recording or written text to be found in the world

I would make up a few plausible terms for the current planet and make the terms sound more formal-ish (see Avatar) since going for a more emotional tone suits the character better.

More about the scientist geeking out, of sorts.

Ex: Day 1987 on Home Fleet 593. We would be landing on Demeter-11 in 02 hours as of recording. Surface scans returned abundant flora and a lack of large predators or hostile intelligent life. Crew members are tense but in high spirits, as am I to be honest. Fingers crossed we land well. C-09.

NOTE 2

The planet is something extraordinary. A few specimens were brought in today but the one that caught my eye (No pun intended) was the strange one with eyes along its stem. It is unknown if the eyes function properly or if it is simply a defence mechanism, similar to a butterfly. We had to take it in immediately after discovering it. Mina thinks it's sentient, and I think she’s paranoid. Either way, this planet is utterly fascinating, who knows what we could learn. Sluurrpp

NOTE 3

The plants are getting a little unruly to say the least. Their vines grow rapidly over night, creeping out of their containment jars and along the floors. We’ve started to take turns with who does vine maintenance but I feel like they get stronger with each trim. Luckily the team has kept them under control enough so far, they don’t get out of their rooms at least. Hopefully we can find a more permanent way to keep them secure in their chambers.

NOTE 4

Maybe Mina was right, these plants might have more to them than we originally thought. They seem to be learning? Yesterday a vine began to wrap around my ankle without me noticing, only retreating when I walked away. It felt oddly deliberate. Not to mention the weird feeling I get from those damn eye plants. I swear they stare at me when I’m in the greenhouse, but everytime I look back at them they look away. They don't seem to be doing anything too detrimental though.. Guess we'll just have to keep a closer eye on them.

NOTE 5
The captain is pissed. They've been growing in our walls and under our floors without us noticing. He got locked in the cockpit because they jammed the damn door mechanisms. It took us 2 hours to get him out of there without damaging anything further. He told our team to get the plants off the ship, but how can we? If we leave now, then what was this trip even for? Cap is just going to have to suck it up because we are not going home with nothing. We're just going to have to really keep them on a leash now.

Suggestion: spaceship begins to break down, trapped on planet
This has gone too far. The plants have grown all over the engine room, jamming the door. Mina told the crew that we could clear them away, but I don't believe it. Nothing we tried made a dent, and the plants that grew back were more resilient than ever. Anything more destructive would destroy the ship. These days, I think that I might not be leaving this planet in this lifetime. I need some fresh air, we all do.

Something about the captain forcing the mission to be voided, much to note writers annoyance

NOTE 7
I'm scared. I can feel them all around me. The emergency alarm went off, and I couldn't understand him but Cap sounded panicked over the intercom. I can't find anyone. I've been hiding for maybe 30 minutes now but I think the ship is going down. We should've left when we saw how uncontrollable these plants were. I think our captain got hurt. God forbid something else happened. I'm going to try and get to the cockpit. Maybe he needs some venom sucked out of him… we'll see…
